Journal readers and workplace experts imagine tech products and innovations that would make their work easier and more productive.

Laptops and phones have become conference devices. In the past, meetings required people to gather in a single room. Now, I'm fully working from home, my husband starts his workday from home, our kids are all attending school from home, and I'm using my office for daily Zoom calls. Each day I meet with my entire team, in addition to many additional meetings with people I work with. Before the pandemic, it could be arranged to have the entire team meet with each other, or with our larger departments or even with the entire company. Now, people are meeting with each other from all over the world.

One benefit of the remote working environment is how much more time you have to be productive. But, there are downsides. I would love to see a customer-relationship-management system that makes it easier to interact meaningfully with the individual students.

Second, AI could individualize instruction for each student. Rather than a one-size-fits-all approach, AI could adjust the material and pace of instruction, based on each student's abilities and needs.

Third, there is so much more information available. I would love to see a system that allows us to view all the information and track our progress. This could include things like attendance, grades, and other metrics that help us stay on track.

Fourth, there are so many more resources available. I would love to see a system that helps us find the resources we need, no matter where we are.

Finally, there are so many more tools available. I would love to see a system that helps us stay organized and on track, no matter what we're working on.

Despite these downsides, I still love working from home. I have the freedom to work from anywhere, and I have more time to be productive. I would order them in obnoxious colors and leave them out for all to see—but not in our houses. I mean, it's mostly just the kids who would wear them, but it's a fun way to show everyone that we're working from home.
